Trial Court	Trial Court is a role that is assigned at a delegation level. Delegates are attorneys arguing a case that involves questioning witnesses, making objections, etc. (like what you'd see on Law & Order).	Attorneys only (judges are played by staff). Delegates will work with a partner.	The District Attorney is technically the head of all of trial court, but will only ever interact with other Jury Trial participants.
Jury Trial	Higher level of trial court. Harder case than trial court. Intensive training. 2 days in court instead of 1 (jury selection and case in chief).	14 appointed positions. Application, then group interview at T&E II. Delegates can be attorneys or judges.	District Attorney, elected in house at T&E II.	Appointed delegates must be able to arrive in Sacramento by Wed afternoon.

Appellate Court	Appellate Court is a role assigned at a delegation level. Appellate cases are cases that have already been brought to trial and now the verdict is being appealed. Delegates will use previously tried cases as examples for how the laws should be applied.	Delegates can be justices or attorneys. The justices will question attorneys during their arguments and write an opinion (verdict) after the trial.	The Attorney General is technically the head of all of appellate court, but will only ever interact with other Supreme Court participants.
Judicial Review	Higher level of appellate court. Judicial Review goes to the law library in Sacramento and researches their own cases, whereas Supreme Court is given all their relevant casework.	Appointed positions: 12 people selected through group interview at T&E II. (Delegates can be justices or attorneys).	Presiding Justice	Appointed delegates must be able to arrive in Sacramento by Wed afternoon.
Supreme Court	Higher level of appellate court.	Appointed positions: 13 people selected through group interview at T&E II. (Delegates can be justices or attorneys).	Chief Justice elected at large. Attorney General, elected in house at T&E II.	Appointed delegates must be able to arrive in Sacramento by Wed afternoon.
